

THE INCOMPREHENSIBLE ART OF LOVE

A difficult subject to understand, perhaps more difficult to explain: love. In fact, there is another subject that love is very related to. That's art. Art is an expression of the artist. At the heart of every artist is a sincere desire to communicate. The same applies to someone who loves. Expressing our feelings is just as difficult as an artist making the other person feel the painting. As Diane Ackerman said "The heart is a museum, filled with the exhibits of a lifetime's love." Here are some methods to follow to turn this complicated feeling into an art form.

The most necessary thing for love for another is to love yourself. A person who doesn't love himself cannot love another. As the researches show, the most important thing for emotional interaction is inner peace. In this direction, it is really necessary to calm the confusion within us and to be in judgment with ourselves. Loving our surroundings requires finding our value.

Responding love with love. It is actually the main component when it comes to communicating with ones that we love. Saying everything we see in them means mutual agreement. We must tell our observations in order to capture the harmony we see in beautiful paintings. In this way, we see that love actually comes from communication, and we show the love we feel with the importance we give to those that we care deeply.

Giving unconditional value. Valuing our feelings without expecting anything in return, as an artist gives to her/his work, is a must to turn love into an art. As an artist said, "Uncommunicated expectations are a premeditated opportunity to be disappointed." Love, like art, deserves to be conveyed and to be appreciated.

By adopting these and many other principles, you can turn love into an art form that becomes more complex to understand every day, but which is also enjoyable and exciting to discover.
